Read the following passage and answer the following questions.

Elephants live in herds of tens, twenties of even fifties. An elephant herd consists of a bull and several old females with their daughters, grand-daughters and young sons.

During the dry season they migrate to the forest on highland areas where they can find plenty of water.

During rainy seasons they move to grassy plains. Each herd is usually led by one cow elephant.

Adult elephant bulls often stay and wander alone, but they visit the herd frequently for mating. If two bulls meet in the herd, they are likely to fight until one is defeated and driven out of the herd. Certain male elephants live alone and they attack people at first sight. They are called roguer bulls. They usually suffer from painful wound, a toothache or something that makes them angry very easily. So they attack anybody who comes their way.

A baby elephant weighs 80kg at birth and is born after gestation period of 22 monthes, longer than any other animal. It sucks its mother's milk for three to four years, using its mouth not its trunk.

Despite their enormous size, elephants are good swimmers. They lik cooling off in swamps and they are often seen swimming across wide rivers.

Elephants have poor eyesight. Their sense of hearing is not very good either in spite their huge ears. But they have a very sharp sense of smell to warn them of danger. The trunk is one of the most important parts of an elephant's body. It is long and almost reaches the ground. It is formed by the nose and the upper up. The trunk is used for feeding and as an organ of smell and of touch. It is used for lifting heavy objects and when elephants are in love, they touch each other with their trunks.

Read the following passage and answer questions 39-50.

When a new baby arrives, the first thing that the parent want to know is whether the baby is normal or handicapped. The realization of having a disabled child comes as that shattering shock to the family. The parents receives the news with a sense of guilt disbelief and anger many questions which can not be answered come to their minds.

Parents often blame each other for bringing a handicapped child into the world as if they have any control over the type of children they have. The mother may try to remember what may have happened to her during pregnancy. Both parents may try to trace any examples of handicapped children among their parents and other blood relatives. When no natural cause can be found the feeling of sadness weighs even more.

In order to overcome all these problems, a family must work together. This is especially important for the mother and the father. Fathers should be actively involved in up bringing of their handicapped children just like mothers. The burden is too big for one parent alone.

This is not time for blaming one another. It is not time for disagreement and quarrels between couples. This is a time when the two parents need each others; love, comfort, affection and support more than ever before handicapped children must be accepted as they are by their families. This acceptance is of great importance to the growth of the child. Acceptance means, not getting stuck at any stage but rather working it through and getting on with the business of meeting the child's need. A child's physical handicapped will not be a misfortune to him unless a parent or someone else makes it seem that way therefore an important step is to love the child the way it is. This means that the parent must accept the child and deal with the problems in a positive way. Parents should be aware that some relatives and friends will often say some unwise and unkind things to them about their handicapped children but they must cope with all this. If parents accept their disabled children and are comfortable with them, then other people will accept them also.

Parents of handicapped children have a special and demanding role to play in spreading the understanding and acceptance of disabled children. Having a handicapped children is indeed a challenge and the best way to live up to the challenge is to work together.
